Bloomberg: Bond Traders Defy Fed and Spark Heated Debate on Wall Street

For Jim Bianco, president of Bianco Research, it's a signal that bond traders are worried that the Fed is cutting rates even as inflation remains stubbornly above its 2% target and the economy keeps defying recession fears.

“The market is really concerned about the policy,” said Bianco. “The concern is that the Fed has gone too far.”

If the Fed continues to cut rates, the mortgage rates will go “vertical,” he added.

Intraday Commentary from Jim Bianco

30-year yield is at its highest level since early September.

99% probability the Fed will cut on Wednesday
(Although it might/should be a 7-5 or 8-4 vote to cut)

Current Funds Rate Target = 3.75% to 4.00%

But after Wednesday, there's only a 24% chance they will cut again in January.

January would be a second pause this cycle (which began with a 50-basis-point cut in September 2024). If this happens, will they get the data to restart cutting for a third time? I would argue no, and if they pause in January, they are done for this cycle.

Looks more like a breakout now.
